Following introductions, Dr. McIntyre reviewed the long history of the university's centers and our special relationship with Highline Community College. Presidents Bell and McIntyre recently signed a charter formalizing the bond between the two institutions. Both institutions share a dream for a higher education center on the Highline campus that is essential to their respective missions. Expanding access to bachelor's and master's degrees will meet the needs of the community and the state in a cost-effective manner.

Using drawings and models, project architects presented a detailed overview of the proposed building and responded to questions. Construction will begin on the Highline higher education center within the next 18 months with occupancy scheduled Fall 2005.

Provosts Dave Soltz and Jack Birmingham reviewed joint curricular goals and stressed the value of the center. Coordinated plans to move students seamlessly through the two institutions are being explored. Joe Dusenberry, a recent alumnus of both institutions, presented a student perspective of the value of a two-plus-two program to placebound students.

Presidents and trustees of both institutions will mount an active effort to secure construction funding through community and legislative support.
